Sex and the menopausal woman: A critical review and analysis

Abstract
Medical discourse has positioned the menopausal transition as one of natural ageing and loss of femininity, with hormonal replacement as the solution. In contrast, feminist critics have argued that women's experience of menopause is being repositioned as pathology and individual medicalised, and so discourse construction of aging and menopause, which are negatively received. The aim of this article is to present a critical analysis of current representations of menopause, drawing on interdisciplinary research, drawing on previous research in this field, as well as qualitative research on the experience of women in midlife, and women who have experienced early-life menopause as a consequence of cancer treatment. We aim to challenge myths and misconceptions about the inevitability of menopause, as well as to explore the embodied changes that some women experience – whether menopause is perceived as a natural process, the signs that signal biological or disease-related changes that have medical status, a particular psychosocial and being, individual to women and a sensory experience of cultural constructions of age, age and femininity. However, sexuality can continue to be a positive experience for women throughout midlife and into old age, with some menopausal women reporting increased sexual desire and frequency. This illustrates the potential construction of menopause as a time of desirable sexual enquiry and desire.
